I finally started out my frontend web development path in Openclassrooms and I feel so happy, the scholarship came as surprise and am very grateful for this opportunity.

I had my first mentoring session on Thursday and I was anxious but it turned out it was a very nice experience and hoping to get more of it....I have a cool mentor.

What I feel about this opportunity is finally I'll gain confidence with my skills and products that I will be developing and with the little backend knowledge that I have gained over the past 2 years, I will be developing fully-functional web apps and have a position at the market place.

I have always wanted to join a volunteering team maybe as mentor and guide the young developers and after am done with the scholarship I will be skilled and up to the task.

I can't wait to start the hands-on projects and get my skills on the road though presentations are a bit scary...

That's it for today...
